Architect Roger Sherman founded cityLAB, a research and design center at UCLA, with his colleague Dana Cuff after realizing a need for an outlet for UCLA architecture students and faculty to solve contemporary urban problems.

Sherman, an architecture and urban design adjunct professor and co-director of cityLAB, and his colleagues use the think tank to commission studies and develop pilot projects. Faculty and students use sustainability ideals and new technologies to propose ways to make cities more livable and sustainable, said Cuff, an architecture and urban design professor and cityLAB director.

Sherman will discuss the impact of the advent of the smartphone on urban design during his talk at the TEDxUCLA conference. He said he will suggest a project that brings people into the Westwood community and off their cell phones.

Sherman said he noticed people today prefer to communicate through their smartphones rather than interact face to face. To counter the problem, Sherman will propose “Westwood Village Blows Up,” a program that encourages Westwood businesses to create teams and interact with other community members, during his presentation Saturday.

Participants would use their smartphones to find pieces of monuments designed by Sherman and his colleagues and bring them back to a meeting location on Broxton Avenue. Teams would work to collectively build three different monuments over the course of six weeks. Sherman said he is currently working to fund the project.

“If the smartphone makes it infinitely more convenient to do things electronically, what’s left for the city? What reason do people have to appear in public and do anything together in person?” Sherman said.

POLL

On Wednesday, the US Justice Department filed charges against 14 high-ranking members of FIFA, the world governing body of international soccer, indicting them on 47 charges including bribery and racketeering. While none of the accused are actual US citizens, prosecutors claimed that the amount of money paid to FIFA for television rights and other business transactions executed by the institution on US soil warranted state intervention. What do you think?

- This prosecution will have a positive impact on FIFA as an organization and root out public suspicions of corruption.
- This will have a negative impact on FIFA's public image and will not change any potential corrupt practices.
- This kind of prosecution is necessary, but the US is acting outside of its rights to do it.
- I don't know how I feel about this.
